

Dollars of War

Serbians cried havoc and let loosed the dogs of war in Bosnia during the 1990s, butchering between 150 thousand and 200 thousand people, mostly civilians, and raping an estimated 50,000 females, many of them children. The Serbian demonic fires of intolerance tore men from their families for summary execution and ignominious burial in mass graves while children of all ages became targets for the entertainment of Serbian sharp shooters and artillery crews.

Serbian politicians, with financial backing from their bankers, intentionally pumped the bellows of ancient wrongs to forge a searing, mindless hatred of Bosnian Muslims. In a ruthless pragmatic pursuit of individual wealth and power, Serbia's President and its chief financier unleashed the stoked hatred on millions of their former countrymen through the savage use of tanks, airplanes and artillery. The President and chief financier claimed a divine right to defend Serbian Christians by which they really meant: "Since we have the power to take the lands and steal the wealth of our Muslim neighbors, we will!"

As with most ethnic, religious and nationalistic wars, greed for wealth and power drives politicians and financiers to utterly destroy the hopes and aspirations of millions of innocent people. They embrace barbarity as their means to make it big regardless of the blood they must spill, bodies they must rip open or agony they must inflict. Although the politicians order the troops into battle, the financiers must bear much of the guilt for the slaughter and torture because without the money to buy the weapons of destruction and pay the butchers in the field, politicians could not launch wars of atrocities. And, as is often the historical case, one key financier provides most of the funding, for a profit of course.

The Serbs had their key financier who profited the most from the pain of tearing flesh, the agony of approaching doom, the screams and crying of children and the shattering of individual worlds. How was it that at the end of the Twentieth Century one relentlessly greedy person could cause such misery? Perhaps the answer lies in that person's sex. Dafina Milanovic, a broad with a fondness for large jewels, ran and eventually looted Serbia's largest bank that financed the war in Bosnia and kept the Serbian economy afloat in the face of United Nations' economic sanctions. This model of new age feminazism financed weapons smuggling operations, ethnic cleansing and the successful election in Serbia of Zeljko Raznjatovic (the fervent Serbian mobster, paramilitary leader and war criminal). Hell hath no fury as a female bent on money.
